Chapter 1

A Dark Night

The evening was dark. Very dark.

The moon and stars were hidden behind the thick clouds that stretched across the sky.

With no breeze to stir the leaves, the silence hung heavy in the warm night air.

There was no sound at all. The frogs had stopped their croaking and even the crickets had given up and fallen asleep. It seemed as if the whole world slept.

Then a cool east wind picked up and came rippling along the ridge of the hillside. Soon the clouds parted, began to break up and drifted away.

The moon peeped out and shone its light on two men, crouching behind bushes, far below.

They were both dressed in black and seemed to be keeping very still, as though waiting for someone or something.

They didn't talk. They just waited.

A sudden sound – a door opening and closing, and then the crunch of wheels on gravel – seemed to be what they were waiting for.

Two bright beams of light lit up the road in front of their hiding place, making them crouch lower and turn their faces towards the ground.

The car moved steadily down the drive and then away down the road.

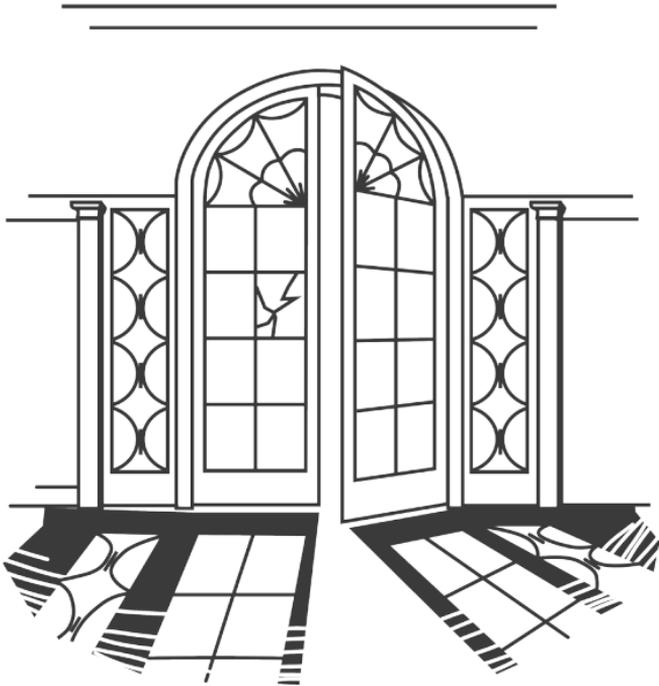

As the noise faded the men got up, stretched and smiled large, toothy grins at each other.

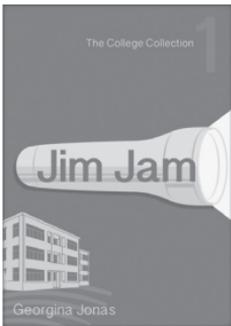

One nodded to the other and they moved quietly towards the house.

Instead of going straight to the front door, the men circled the house – one went right, the other left – and slipped round to the back.

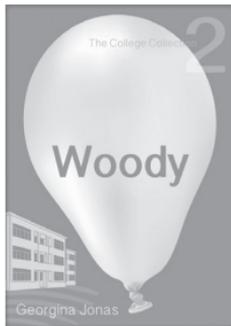

With a thumbs up signal, they indicated to each other that all was well and, after another furtive look over their shoulders, cracked the glass in a ground floor window.
